Opening a mechanic shop can be a rewarding career, especially if you want to do something with your hands. People need their cars to get around, so there's always a need to keep them running smoothly. If you want to open a car dealership properly, getting started will take some time, some training and solid planning. You don't technically need any training to open a car dealership, but your company will garner some respect if your mechanics are certified by the National Institute for Automotive Service Excellence. Of course, you can always hire the mechanic who followed that path, but odds are that if you're interested in opening a mechanic shop, you're a mechanic yourself. To get ASE certified, you need two years of training at work. You can do some of this through formal education, like a business school or community college, or you can speed up your path by taking an ASE-accredited certificate program. Once you've accumulated two years of credit, you'll need to pass a written test, and that's not the easiest either. Only two-thirds of the people pass the test on their first attempt. It's true that you can succeed as an all-around general mechanic, but stores that specialize can actually bring in more customers if they play it smart. Maybe you live in an area with highly congested highways and confusing off-and-off- Wouldn't you like to open a mechanic shop specializing in collision in an area where collisions are likely to happen? Or maybe you'll notice there are few stores that specialize in transfers in the area. You can fill this hole. With ASE certification, you can choose a specialty from specific car manufacturers for things like truck equipment, heavy machinery, and collision repair. If you want to open a car dealership, know that the place is everything. Your business probably won't succeed if you decide to set up your business in an area with few cars or where few people drive. For example, a mechanic who opens a store on Bald Head Island in North Carolina would certainly fail if he is not in the golf cart business because the island does not allow cars. For a traditional mechanic shop, a place near a highway or a place where people regularly break down is your best bet. Also make sure you have enough space for all the lifts you need and to park customer cars. Open auto stores are not cheap. You are likely to spend around $4,000 per lift and $4,000 on related insurance policies each year. Your tools can cost around $15,000 just to get started, and a diagnostics machine alone is $5,000 to $10,000. With all the starting costs, you can spend around $25,000 to $75,000 just to open your store, and that can skyrocket if you buy your lottery ticket instead of renting it. Overall, this isn't much compared to most companies, but it's certainly not a small piece of change. If you do not have this type of funding yourself, you want to consider approaching a bank or small business administration for a loan. Make sure you have a one business plan in place to get the absolute best prices. Each company must go through the same legal hoops. You must form a legal business entity (LLC, S Corp, etc.), register with the IRS and obtain an employer identification number so that you can pay taxes. You must also obtain a business license from your local government and get the required insurance. For a car dealership, you need a general liability plan, but you also need employee compensation if you plan to hire employees. Commercial car insurance is not required, but it is a good idea. This protects your business if any of your employees get into an accident while driving a customer's car around your lot. Once you've got the right insurance, you can start hiring employees. Auto stores generally make the most of their money from 10 popular services that average out at $144.10 per job. This includes: Oil and Lube (which accounts for about 20 jobs per week on average) Alignments Diagnostics Brake services A/C repair refrigerant recycling/charging Electronic engine control services Exhaust gas replacement generator repair and replacement ensure that your prices remain competitive. A/C services generally rake in the most at an average of $276 per job. Brake services come in second place on average $223 per job. Oil and lube are the cheapest at an average of $30 per job. A car dealership will not succeed if no one knows it is there. Advertise your store online with services like Yelp, Google and Angie's List. Also consider calling towing companies and giving them incentives to refer customers because, after all, they deal with broken cars. Coupons for discounted services, like $10 oil changes, will help bring in new customers who can become repeat customers.
